THE BATTLE SCENE.

BY THE LATE J. S. SURKE.

The day dawned bright and beautiful,

The day dawned bright and beautin.
The sunbeams kissed the earth.
The joyons songe of many birds.
Made morn a scene of mirth.
The little flowers looked fresh again.
The dew-drops their away—
All nature seemed to wolcome

The coming of the day. But le' in the far off distance

But le' in the far ell distance,
A speck appears in view
Lake a fency olond of sammer time.
It slowly parts in two.
It passes round a forest,
A part on either side,
And now a heavy seand is brand,
Like the redling of the tide.
As I gaze upon that object,
Advancing up the glem,
Methought I could distinguish.
The forms of many men;
And yet while I was gazing
A sound came to my car.
Which childed the blood within my a
And filled my heart with four
I turned to the direction
From which the sound came forth
And saw another object.

From which the sound came forth
And saw another object
Advancing from the north
I now knew these were enemies.
Decked cut in bright array.
To meet in deadly conflict
Upon that fatal day.
And that the morrow sem
Would shine upon a plain
Strown with fallen heroes,
Who no er would rise again
Their polished swords and bayoner.
Sparkled in the san.

Sparkled in the sun,
And the bosoning of the comes
Amounced the strife begue
Every shut and every stroke
Sovered a cheri of life,

As nearer pressed those combatant In herce and deadly strice.

Wrung by mortal pain From lives that no'er would atter

From lives that ne or would after A word on earth again. The sharp groans of the dying—Their sad and plaintive wall Filled the soul with terror, And made the cheek turn paie. Like grass before the mower's seythe. Those ranks of herces fell. Rushing mady to that gate. They knew would come so well. All day long they battled. Those bands of herces braves. As long the blood-red barrier. O'er heaps of dying waved. As the shades of seening gathered Round that bloody fray. The ranks of each drew slowly bank. In blank and mate dismay.

The ranks of each drew slowly back. In blank and mute disnay.

When the smoke and dust of battle Rose from the gory field.

A terrifying sight was seen.

That neath thom lay concented.

A thousand blackened corpacs.

Were scattered ofer the plain.

Where they so nobly fighting foll.

But where they fell in vain.

The structle now was ended.

The survey of the moon looked down.

On those ghardly forms at rest.

Ne more would joy or sorrow.

Distarb their slumber now.

No more would friends or kiming date on their pallid brow.

The rarest pleasure of the earth.

The rarest pleasure of the earth Would please them now no more

MIDDLEBURY, VT., DECEMBER 8, 1874.

THE NEW WING,

Jane Derwent and James Athol were a pair of lovers who had long deferred their marriage day in order to begin housekeeping with a roof of their own over their heads, however humble. James sive habits in his way, such as a love for fine clothes, a fatal fondness for making Jane costly presents, a weakness for operas and concerts, Cologne-water and bouquets.
